Americans Man Maginot Guns

Each Weapon Fired
One Round Against
Thionville Positions

Isle Margot Line, Sept. 14. — The 100th American Infantry Division, which is now in the old French Maginot Line today and should be in the line at Thionville, across the Moselle River near the Luxembourg border, has fired its first round.

Forty-three independent from artillery company enthusiastically loaded and fired the first round, corresponding to the American 100 mm gun.

They pointed at least 30 rounds at German positions in Thionville, and saw some smoke above the rooftops. The gun was fired for the first time at 4 P. M. yesterday, when each of them fired one round.

It is Robert J. Henderson, 25, of Xenia, Ohio, and then:

"We will fire quite a few more by tomorrow."

The Germans were well aware of the fort's position and they were armed with several short bursts of machine gun fire. They said that Henderson and Robert Cronk, 21, of Chicago, Illinois, were on the side of the fort for 20 minutes.

"We climbed atop the fort into the observation tower to see what effect the Americans had on the town, and the Germans who already had the fort under fire."

When we fired, the enemy had a machine gun fire at the fort. Henderson and Cronk were not hurt.
